xs-XL: Expanding Art

The transportation of artworks from country to country can be a very expensive operation, so that the only truly wealthy, well-funded galleries and institutions can afford to organize exhibitions of works from overseas. This can restrict artists in having their works featured internationally and even within their home region. Five artists in the Philippines met the challenge by producing works that could be packed into a single box and when unpacked, converted a ‘fantastic’ space into a full exhibition. Inspired by xs-XL (extra-small - EXTRA LARGE), a group show initiated, organized, and co-curated by Sculpture Square in Singapore, which displayed the exhibition from 26 July to 26 August.

Gerardo Tan, whose works have won awards in Australia, the USA, and several Asian countries, mounted gilded picture frames on two gold painted panels, facing each other, lit and captioned in traditional fashion, but with a small picture at the centre of each frame consisting of formless dust. Tan’s friend, the artist restorer Helmholtz Zobert, collected the dust whilst he was cleaning it from paintings by Canaletto and the Filipino artist Juan Luna. Tan says that he would like to have covered the walls with golden leaf, but it would have been too expensive, ‘I wanted to counter pose something that’s worthless with something that’s precious.’

Compressed/Decompressed is a series of photographs that can be stored as digital images. Tan took them over two years, during his travels in the Philippines and abroad. Each photo shows a different number, between 1 and 100, printed or displayed on an object in a way that interested Tan. Some occurred in fairly obvious places, such as on a highway sign, but others were found in more unexpected locations: one is on a washing bowl in a market. For Tan, this variety of contexts shows the pervasive presence of numbers in the human world.

Katya Guerrero, the assistant director of a gallery café in Quezon City, over a cheque for 90,000 pesos as a small item that could easily be expanded in the XL transformation. Converted into a pyramidal heap of shiny golden Singapore five-cent coins, it constituted Interest, one of Guerrero’s two offerings. Beforehand, she wondered whether the amount of money would change as viewers came by and displayed added interest.

Sid Hidawa, director of the Cultural Centre of the Philippines Museums and Galleries, used a sari, a traditional garment, to wrap around his body like a fortress, and was dressed as a “sari warrior,” preparing people wearing fashionable choker necklaces. His work featured these close-ups configured in a great circle, which balanced the sense of expansion and the fortresses as constitutive, confining objects.

Cecilia Avancena works between Europe and Asia, conducting research and lecturing. Her Gypsy Mood Thermometer in the XL show recalled a tradition of Roma communities in southern France and Spain in which elders gave empty jars to engaged couples. In them they placed different coloured beads or grains according to their moods and feelings, allowing the overall state of their relationship to be revealed and thus improving their chances of a happy marriage. Avancena’s work began as a collection of empty jars in which visitors could place coloured glass stones in any way that suited their personal feelings.

There is certainly interest in Singapore in seeing what artists from other countries in the region are producing, and the Philippines has a lively arts scene which is underexplored to the outside world due to economic restrictions. The possibility of taking xs-XL elsewhere is still being explored. While artworks in the show teased, entertained, and provoked Singaporean viewers, they also drew attention to the much-trumpeted era of globalization, and successfully raised the question of future contact between artists who are not from rich countries with audiences in other lands.
