The Translation of Russian Literature in Republican China

By Mark Gamsa

The place of Russian literature in twentieth-century China has prominently been a site of ideological contest. Research on Russian-Chinese literary contacts in the Soviet Union and the People’s Republic of China has concentrated on the period from 1920 to the mid-1940s, when the translation corpus of the republican period was considered against the changing political background, and the ideological agencies that previous misrepresentation of the place occupied in the translation corpus of the republican period, and to recognize that previous misrepresentation of the place occupied in the translation corpus of the republican period, and to recognize that previous misrepresentation of the
