China's recent emergence as a world power will undoubtedly be seen by future generations as one of the transformative events of our time. The country's recent and remarkable re-emergence onto the world stage has startled everyone, not in the least China itself, whose leaders seem to be almost as surprised as the rest of us by its all-encompassing swiftness. The twentieth century was dominated by the West, particularly America. After World War II it even began to be known as the ‘American Century’, with the War representing the height of American values, as the ‘American Century’, with the War representing the height of American values, as one of the transformative events of our time. The country's recent and remarkable re-emergence onto the world stage has startled everyone, not in the least China itself, whose leaders seem to be almost as surprised as the rest of us by its all-encompassing swiftness. The twentieth century was dominated by the West, particularly America. After World War II it even began to be known as the ‘American Century’, with the War representing the height of American values, as the ‘American Century’, with the War representing the height of American values, as one of the transformative events of our time. The country's recent and remarkable re-emergence onto the world stage has startled everyone, not in the least China itself, whose leaders seem to be almost as surprised as the rest of us by its all-encompassing swiftness. The twentieth century was dominated by the West, particularly America. After World War II it even began to be known as the ‘American Century’, with the War representing the height of American values, as the ‘American Century’, with the War representing the height of American values,
In recent years. The infrastructure that is being created in order to bridge the economic divide between urban and rural areas, a gap that has continued to increase. One other area of inequality that the Chinese government in the future will be lessening the income gap between the rich and the poor. One of the most important challenges facing China's leaders is how to improve the lives of its citizens. According to the IIEC and CSIS, China's current pace of urbanization is lagging behind the rest of the world. In 1950, approximately 30 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). In 2008, 88 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). This is a significant challenge for the Chinese government, as it aims to improve the lives of its citizens. The Chinese government has announced plans to build 200 million units of rural housing in the next decade (ibid.)

The One thing that alarmists in the West are overlooking is the process of political reform. It certainly does not operate in a setting where there is no political competition. The one-party state operates as a meritocracy, where talent, hard work, and drive will be rewarded. The fact is that China is undergoing a process of political reform, which is expected to continue in the future.

One of the most important challenges facing China's government in the future will be to lessen the income gap between urban and rural areas. One area of inequality that the Chinese government in the future will be lessening is the income gap between the rich and the poor. One of the most important challenges facing China's leaders is how to improve the lives of its citizens. According to the IIEC and CSIS, China's current pace of urbanization is lagging behind the rest of the world. In 1950, approximately 30 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). In 2008, 88 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). This is a significant challenge for the Chinese government, as it aims to improve the lives of its citizens. The Chinese government has announced plans to build 200 million units of rural housing in the next decade (ibid.).

The One thing that alarmists in the West are overlooking is the process of political reform. It certainly does not operate in a setting where there is no political competition. The one-party state operates as a meritocracy, where talent, hard work, and drive will be rewarded. The fact is that China is undergoing a process of political reform, which is expected to continue in the future.

One of the most important challenges facing China's government in the future will be to lessen the income gap between urban and rural areas. One area of inequality that the Chinese government in the future will be lessening is the income gap between the rich and the poor. One of the most important challenges facing China's leaders is how to improve the lives of its citizens. According to the IIEC and CSIS, China's current pace of urbanization is lagging behind the rest of the world. In 1950, approximately 30 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). In 2008, 88 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). This is a significant challenge for the Chinese government, as it aims to improve the lives of its citizens. The Chinese government has announced plans to build 200 million units of rural housing in the next decade (ibid.).

The One thing that alarmists in the West are overlooking is the process of political reform. It certainly does not operate in a setting where there is no political competition. The one-party state operates as a meritocracy, where talent, hard work, and drive will be rewarded. The fact is that China is undergoing a process of political reform, which is expected to continue in the future.

One of the most important challenges facing China's government in the future will be to lessen the income gap between urban and rural areas. One area of inequality that the Chinese government in the future will be lessening is the income gap between the rich and the poor. One of the most important challenges facing China's leaders is how to improve the lives of its citizens. According to the IIEC and CSIS, China's current pace of urbanization is lagging behind the rest of the world. In 1950, approximately 30 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). In 2008, 88 percent of the world's population lived in cities (amere 14,000 to 15,000). This is a significant challenge for the Chinese government, as it aims to improve the lives of its citizens. The Chinese government has announced plans to build 200 million units of rural housing in the next decade (ibid.).

The One thing that alarmists in the West are overlooking is the process of political reform. It certainly does not operate in a setting where there is no political competition. The one-party state operates as a meritocracy, where talent, hard work, and drive will be rewarded. The fact is that China is undergoing a process of political reform, which is expected to continue in the future.

One of the most important challenges facing China's government in the future will be to lessen the income gap between urban and rural areas. One area of inequality that the Chinese government in the future will be lessening is the income gap between the rich and the poor. One of the most important challenges facing China's leaders is how to improve the lives of its citizens. According to the IIEC and CSIS, China's current pace of urbanization is lagging behind the rest of the world. In 1950, approximately 30 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). In 2008, 88 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). This is a significant challenge for the Chinese government, as it aims to improve the lives of its citizens. The Chinese government has announced plans to build 200 million units of rural housing in the next decade (ibid.).

The One thing that alarmists in the West are overlooking is the process of political reform. It certainly does not operate in a setting where there is no political competition. The one-party state operates as a meritocracy, where talent, hard work, and drive will be rewarded. The fact is that China is undergoing a process of political reform, which is expected to continue in the future.

One of the most important challenges facing China's government in the future will be to lessen the income gap between urban and rural areas. One area of inequality that the Chinese government in the future will be lessening is the income gap between the rich and the poor. One of the most important challenges facing China's leaders is how to improve the lives of its citizens. According to the IIEC and CSIS, China's current pace of urbanization is lagging behind the rest of the world. In 1950, approximately 30 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). In 2008, 88 percent of the world's population lived in cities (a mere 14,000 to 15,000). This is a significant challenge for the Chinese government, as it aims to improve the lives of its citizens. The Chinese government has announced plans to build 200 million units of rural housing in the next decade (ibid.).

The One thing that alarmists in the West are overlooking is the process of political reform. It certainly does not operate in a setting where there is no political competition. The one-party state operates as a meritocracy, where talent, hard work, and drive will be rewarded. The fact is that China is undergoing a process of political reform, which is expected to continue in the future.